I mostly dislike large companies because they often have little competition when they get too big, ruining innovation. And what little innovation there is, is very slow. Whereas when you have a ton of smaller companies (Rather, companies all on the same level), they all compete to create a better product. 'Tis the basis of capitalism, and it works quite well. Until the company gets TOO big, that is.

Thankfully, the nature of revolt is also in our nature, so when a company gets too big, people bash it to keep it under control, much like how alot of C&C fans bash EA. It's not exactly the best choice or the most intelligent, but it's somewhat necessary to keep EA in line. Otherwise, we'll continue getting shitty games.

As for Microsoft, I'm kind of indifferent to them. They DO have plenty of great products, and for being one of the largest companies in the world, they have a TON to manage, so I can sympathize with them not being able to please everyone. But, on the other hand, things like Vista and such have little to no excuse to have been released.
