Subject: Re: Why do people hate big business?
Posted by BlueThen on Wed, 14 Jan 2009 02:14:20 GMT
View Forum Message <> Reply to Message

Nero wrote on Tue, 13 January 2009 03:36Big companies most likely think:
"We have our name, we have our fame, we can release whatever we want for the price we ask, people will buy it."

Also, sometimes they even force their own creations into their releases. Microsoft inherits their own browser IE7 in Vista, they inherit Media Player etc. Though Winamp is proven to be better than WMP and Firefox is better than IE7.

They're just a big bunch of jackasses which are only out on MONEY.
They do that because it's standard. You can't really expect them to not include any browser with Vista, because that would make it a lot more difficult for people to access websites. FireFox isn't their product, and it's probably illegal in some way for Vista to use it as a standard.

Same goes for Windows Media Player. It's standard on Windows. Also, you can't really "prove" that one product is better than another, that's just too biased. Just because you happen to prefer those things over Vista's standard programs, doesn't mean it's wrong for them to be using these products.

What most of everyone else here is saying pretty much sums it up. Large companies yearns to please everyone, so they have to pretty much desperately try and release things that makes everyone happy, which never really works.