Well, I don't "know" there's nothing left after death, anymore than I "know" that gods were invented by humans. It looks very, very likely, though, but I am quite willing to look at the evidence pointing the other way, just as soon as somebody finally comes up with some.

As for "healthy way to live", it absolutely is; this is the only life of whose existence we know for certain, which makes it all the more precious.

Nukelt15 wroteFor example, "Tsar" and "Kaiser," the titles of the Russian and German rulers in the early 1900s, were both derived from "Caesar"- which was the name of Rome's first emperor and thereafter the title of every Roman emperor following, passed on to other cultures through Rome's tremendous influence on the Western world.

Since you mention the Tsar and the Kaiser, did you happen to read the last religious debate I found myself participating in...?
