I find it amazing how people can loose a CD Key that was printed on the back of a large game manual that was tightly packed in the CD box, but they never loose either of the game CD's.

If you genuinely own a copy of this great game, then ring EA tech support - Offer to send them proof that you have everything other than the aforementioned Game Manual (ie you will send a photo of the CD's perched in your sink with two grapes and fourteen bananas) and ask very nicely for the CD key that you deserve (Maybe explaining how such CD keys can acyually backfire on loyal customers like yourself).

If however you have a "borrowed" copy of the game, but you can't work out how to get yourself a CDKey, then you really shouldn't be asking people who spent $40 for their keys.

If you want to try the game, download the demo. If you can't afford the game, then why the hell did you spend money on a PC capable of running it?
