I guess that's the price we pay for not living someplace inhospitable, like Arizona.

Also, Hi Dante.

Inhospitable? No natural disasters and no snow for the trade-off of a few months of heat.

115ish degree weather for half the year is a bit more than "a few months of heat". Last time I was in Arizona it was just to Havasu, and a stray coke can rolling around in the truck of my car actually exploded from the heat. Man was not meant to live in such places.

I mean, realistically, what you're telling me is that it's better to be here Arizona than here:
California

And really, all the people that live here can't be wrong.
