Define "normal people." Also, they aren't 'anime-based' because then they would take after an anime. There are a few anime based DS games, but they usually aren't that good.

But I think I know what games you are talking about: Games with characters that look like they belong in an anime, correct?

It's funny how you put it and it's made even more funnier after you listed those games because you contradict yourself. Mario, Zelda, Metroid. Those are all "anime-esque" type games. You know, the kind you said "normal people" don't play?

You should play more of those types of games, you might actually enjoy it. A lot of them are very long, have an excellent story, addictive gameplay, and great game mechanics.

Personally, I really didn't like New Super Mario Bros, Metroid Prime Hunters, or Mario Party DS. Mario Kart was also kind of boring, but I played it when I had nothing else to do. Plus it can be fun over WiFi and in groups of 3 or more friends.

I still haven't beaten Phantom Hourglass yet. Don't get me wrong, I love Zelda games, but the thing about Phantom Hourglass is that it forces you to do the same exact dungeon over and over again. It's boring and repetitive. Whenever I get up to it again, I usually stop playing for a month or two before I decide to try it again. I hear Spirit Tracks follows a similar mechanic but they fixed it so you don't have to fight the same enemies and redo the same puzzles. (When you solve something, it is solved) So, I'm looking forward to playing that after I beat Phantom Hourglass.
