M0FiR3 wrote on Mon, 10 January 2011 03:14 the kid that watches 9000 hours of anime a day pretends he doesn't know .. i still don't know what gender the person in your own avatar is ... A couple things here:

1. Failed attempt at meme humor (Or perhaps you didn't realize what you said?) (Over 9,000!)
2. Where exactly did you develop the idea that I am supposedly obsessed with anime to begin with? The only thing that relates anime as an interest of mine is my avatar. There are other people on this forum that are apparently way more open to their interest in it... so why single me out? Do you have a crush on me or something? I'm flattered but unfortunately I don't swing that way.
3. I'm not pretending, I really don't know. It isn't uncommon for characters to share characteristics of the opposite sex (ARTISTICALLY, NOT biologically). The first time I saw Edward in Cowboy Bebop I thought she was a boy.

4. Shana, as seen in my avatar, is a girl from the anime Shakugan no Shana.

And to be honest, it isn't like I really, really love Shakugan no Shana (which is actually the name of the sword she uses, so don't go getting the wrong idea). I do like the show, sure, but it isn't like a master piece or anything. I just like her character design and that's why it's my avatar. (Flaming swords are cliché, but flaming girl is something new to me.)

I have used avatars of characters from shows and sources I've never seen before. In fact my last avatar, which was this one (I think):

is Miku Hatsune, and she isn't from an anime at all. She is actually a singing synthesizer computer program. (Think of her sort of like a singing version of Microsoft Sam). I've never used the program, but I like her design and that's all that I really care about.

The point is, my avatar isn't a window for my likes and dislikes. It's just there to look cool.
