I'll stick with standard hard drives for now, give SSDs a few more years to run into all the bugs; not in any real rush to get a faster disc yet anyway; I start my computer before I get into the shower in the morning, so boot time has never been an issue for me.

As for windows 8, our server owner was running a beta of windows 8 for a while for his server, and the FDS usually averaged around 6-8 fps slower than it does now that he moved back to 7 (internal test server, not actual). However, it's possible they have cleaned it up more since the beta and maybe it runs better now.

I am disappointed about the start menu being removed; back in the day I wouldn't have cared as I used to have stuff all over my desktop; but more recently the only thing I keep on it is recycle bin. It seems like this start window (whatever they call it) is more like another desktop instead of an organized list lol.
