Quote:It may not be an innate characteristic, but there has to be something that happens early in life or perhaps more likely in early childhood to influence this aspect of one's personality... Sure, one can make a choice to engage in homosexual acts, but how much can one help his or her attraction to someone? How can you decide who you like; what you like?

I'm no expert on the subject, and definately don't know firsthand, but I have had conversations with former homosexuals who were able to "outgrow" their attraction to other man and are now have wives. It's not my place to answer your question.

Quote:i'd like to see proof backing up that statement... it's not a true statistic.

I heard that in a lecture one time. I have the book the lecturer wrote, but haven't had time to go find the quote. Anyways, this guy has been talking to homosexuals for years and I think determined the statistic on his own. Since I haven't offered you any proof, then you can disregard that remark.

Quote:1. People are born gay, and even if by some people it happens due to their childhood, it's still not their fault and not wrong.

If their homosexuality is a result of their childhood, then it doesn't mean they are born homosexual.

Quote:2. Homosexuality happens in nature. Animals can be gay too. Therefor it's natural and not wrong.

Animals also rape, murder, and are often involved in cannibalism. I can justify all of this according to your logic.

Quote:3. I find it quite arrogant that some people claim to know who god loves and who he doesn't love. Even more that they seem to know god's motives.

I don't believe anyone said God doesn't love homosexuals, but that the act of homosexuality is a sin.

It is futile to argue ethics with people who base their ethics within their own opinions. Nothing will be accomplished.
