I'm beginning to believe that EVERYONE has a TINY PIECE of the truth, yet they all blow it up to be the absolute, no contest, one-and-only way to live. If you think you know the entire truth of existence, you are as flawed as those you criticize.

Quote:u can say times change, and i agree, but there are absolute truths

Times DO change. For several centuries after the death of Jesus, it was absolutely unacceptable to be a Christian. The Roman Empire used them in gladiatorial games, just for something to kill. Now, Christianity is the single most powerful religion in the world. 2000 years ago, it didn't even exist. And you somehow presume that you are any more "right" than anyone else is?

Would you take away womens' suffrage, just because they did not have it 100 years ago? Would you allow parents to beat their children, just because it was once an accepted norm?

What was that the Bible said about NOT judging others? You continue to rag on how one person or another has no right to do this or do that, when in reality you are doing the same thing. Is that not hypocritical? FFS, there isn't one Christian church which remembers exactly what the message of their supposed savior was. "Love thy neighbor..." yeah, but only if they're not gay, atheist, pagan, or anything else we don't agree with. Don't be so eager to examine others' flaws when you have just as many of your own.

Everyone wants to believe that theirs is the one and only truth, but they are simply afraid to accept that there is more than one way to go about living. That goes for ALL religions. NO EXCEPTIONS. If you want to believe something is wrong, go ahead; that is your right. Just NEVER assume that everyone else must believe in the same version of truth.
