eggmacBut my point about the media is not to pick up one source which one can trust, but not to believe in whatever is said in the media and to question it everytime. Propaganda can so easily affect us, which it does, hence it is in one own's responsibility to try to keep a broad view on things and to try to read between the lines.

To rely on one source is foolish, I agree.

I currently have in my favorites:

CNN
REUTERS
ABCNEWS
ASSOCIATED PRESS
MSNBC

I find REUTERS the most non-biased of the major information sources.

" During both World Wars, Reuters came under pressure from the British government to serve British interests. In 1941 Reuters deflected this pressure by restructuring itself as a private company. The new owners, the British national and provincial press, formed the Reuters Trust, with independent trustees. The Trust preserves Reuters independence and neutrality. The principles of the Trust were maintained and the power to enforce them was strengthened when Reuters became a public company in 1984. (See Reuters Independence and Trust Principles)."
