It's funny how some of the people who say "What created God? How could he exist if nothing else created him?" usually say "Oh, well, it's just always been there" when asked "What created the matter for the Big Bang?" yet they don't realize they just contradicted themselves.

What created God, you ask? Nothing. You know why? Because he's always been there. Before the Big Bang, before the creation of matter, before all other things, there was God. How can someone say he can't exist since nothing made him?
