That's the media overstating and over reacting to a small instance. In an intense circumstance like that a small error like that is likely to happen, HARDLY any thing to condemn a person for, but the media tends to have a slant on things so they make too much of a bit deal out of it. The congress likely shouldn't even spend much time on it as it is trivial. If they are going to complain about the communication gaps and co-ordination then they just need to make a big network that interlinking the fire and police department communication systems, and make a committment to help enhance the co-ordination and communications. That's all that needs to be done. The media has a point the finger to get news complex because of that saying, "Good news is bad news, and bad news is good news" which means any thing that is out of the ordinary or is a disaster is news to report.

I would be more worried about how the media slants things tainting the truth with a stretch and less worried about congress.
