NodbuggerHey, my dad was in Iraq for a year.

Don't take what I said the wrong way. I have absolutely nothing wrong with soldiers doing their duty. They're just doing their jobs. I'm saying there is something wrong with the choices with the people at the top.

Quote:He was stationed near one of the poorest cities in Iraq. They made Harlem look like Beverly Hills. They had no roads, schools, or clean water. They now have that and tons more. They have business there they have food they have all new conveniences.

Well at the same time, you're likely to see a charred baby being loaded onto a truck of dead innocents with a family crying hysterically asking Allah why it had to happen to them.

Quote:What we did is what we knew what was going to happen.

huh?

Quote:These people could have either been terrorized and treated like shit for 50 more years or what is happening now. A few months of violence then after that they will be fine.

Who said anything about allowing the tyranny to continue? The UN doesn't support terrorism. The don't (at the time) support unnecessary wars either.

Quote:Do you know how many civilians we killed before d-day? the French death toll 30min into d-day was over 3000. People. I believe the total came to over 10000. We killed more French civilians on d-day then German soldiers.

But word war two was worth it.

But remember, there is a difference between helping your allies and invading another country. After Pearl Harbour, the US finally decided to send some manpower in the east and retake France from an invading force. Not unlike the Gulf War, an ally is under attack, and the enemy is forced out. Iraq was not an ally in March 2003, and yet it was invaded on shakey pretenses and pick'n'choose tactics (Remember! The Mafia are still terrorists! But they're not being dealt with as harshly as Iraq is!). It's the whole "the ends don't justify the means" thing over again. Those schools, stores, roads, whatever, are all good things. But they don't justify the means that were used to get them.

And don't get me started on the torture incident.
