SuperFlyingEngiWell, for aall of the lobbyists running around right now, i wouldn't expect a bill that benefits everyone to come out of a bunch of "experts."

Every American should have the basic right to life. If they need medical care, they should be able to get medical care. Pretty much all of the modernized countries in the world today have available medical care for all, except the U.S. If we took all of the money we waste on crap programs like Star Wars, and put it in to the medical insurance for all pot, many fewer people would die as a result from diseases and injurys that can be treated. If a child has child leukemia, but no health insurance, hospitals sort of shake their heads and say they can't do anything about it. If the child does have insurance, then the hospitals say, "Okay, that's easy to treat." America shouldn't work this way. Everyone should have access to good medical treatment, regardless of how rich or poor they are.

And what would the Democratic solution be for a guy like me that holds a job, and pays 1/5 of my pay to ensure that my family has benefits?

Because if you tell me that people with no jobs get the same treatment as someone like me with two freakin jobs , then you can stick that theory where the sun doesn't shine.

What incentive is thee for me to even work then? I can just sit at home, collect welfare, get my free food, free home repairs, and healthcare.
