What bullshit.

I was talking to a few *online friends* of mines before Generals came out about its so-called "anti-cheat technoledgey", which will flash a mesage across the screen telling what cheat is being used by who.----EA was boasting about that about 3 months before the game was released, everyone was exited. I have yet to see this mesage, the closest thing to it is the "out of sync" mesage, which just tells you that {someone} was trying to use a {cheat}.

EA is bullshit, im not going to buy any more games from them, Im surprised at myself for even buying Generals after all the bad reviews.

I have found glitches upon bugs upon problems in the game, some that actually affect gameplay and others that are just something that doesnt match their patterns, showing that something is wrong.

Its a real shame really that they even put C&C in the title. For that, C&C is dead now, also because Westwood is gone(Even though their support sucked and the games had cheats, the games were still good.)

And they have no excuses what so ever for their servers that disscnect you while talking in the lobby, doing basically nothing at all. Why did they have to use GaySpy servers instead of their own?

And for all the people who want to file a lawsuit agenst them, dont waste your time. I may only be 14 with no special education in lawschool, but even I know this shit. You tell your lawyer you want to file a lawsuit agenst a game company for having crappy games, they will laugh at you. No doubt about it. "Let the buyer beware", a phrase that comes into play. Its main meaning basically tells people that they should know what they are buying before they actually buy it, in order to avoid these problems.

Honostly, why would anyone in the right-mind spend the money for a court hearing and a lawyer and all the other stuff that requires paying in order to file a lawsuit/go to court over a game? The game costs 50$ USD, Is it really worth it? Your better off to just froget about it and give the game to the little kid next door.

Take time to read that, the bottem part has some good points for all you people who all think you can sue all the world for pissing you off.
