Did you know that the human mind can read backwards?? Read the following normally.....

The phaomneil pweor of the hmuan mnid. Aoccdrmig to a rseaechr at Cmabrigde Uinervtisy, it deosn't mttar in waht oredr the ltteers in a wrod are, the olny iprmoatnt tihng is taht the frist and lsat ltteers are in the rghit pclae.

The rset can be a toatl mses, and you can sitll raed it wouthit a porbelm. Tihs is bcuseae the huamn mnid deos not raed ervey lteter by itslef, but the wrod as a wlohe!

The n00bs do have a chance

Possible hole in your thoery:

They type in all Caps, and don't exactly follow proper sentence structure.

I wonder if the second word was intentionally misspelled? (I think it's supposed to be 'phenomenal' but it doesn't quite have the right letters for that... and 'phenominal' isn't a word...)

None of the other words bothered me when I read it though.... Does their research say that we can spot misspellings without much effort even when the letters are all mixed up like that, too?

I think it may also pertain to "force of habit". Once you've used a word for X number of years, you can probably identify it through grotesque errors.

Interesting. I find it just as easy and fast as reading those words when they are corrected.

It doesn't seem to work as well the first time if the sentence doesn't at least make sense. "My honors teacher taught? us that (used to be my honors he dropped me, I always talked shit to him)?" I understood it eventually but it took me a lot longer than the initial paragraph in the first post.

Until the words get too big:

Dranitoicty
Snatugire
Mebotharord
Dapitluce

Even if you just scramble some of the words in the article more, they're harder. Like 'Pelborm' instead of 'Porbelm'. But I won't be a buzz kill.

5 points to the person who gets all the words.

But you've jumbled those words up in a fashion where the letters can't be rearranged next to each other to form the word. That's not the same, it's a puzzle.

According to the "study", all that matters is that the first and last letters are in the right place and I did that. What the study should've said is that all you can do is swap a letter or two with the one next to it.

z3101.Dranitoicty = ?

2.Snatugire = Signature

3.Mebotharord = Motherboard

4.Dapitluce = ?

2 & 3 were really easy.

4 is duplicate

1 i'm not sure. first thought is 'dictionary' but that doesn't have enough t's.
