Seems like adware you download in order to get long distance... I wouldn't do it.

Or, you could just use MSN messenger or something like that... All you need is a microphone... like this:

That is the greatest example of a site that SELLS your email address to those advertisements. You sign up, thinking you'll get something, AND YOU DON'T GET ANYTHING BUT SPAM.

Trust me. Besides, how can they EMAIL you your calling card? That's pathetic.

I totally agree with what you guys are saying about this site, but just to clarify... It'd be easy to email a calling card... all it is is a card w/ a # to call for the service, and a pin number to use. That's all they'd have to email to you.

I wouldn't do it although, I get enough spam as it is, and don't need it even if it's legit.

Another good way to identify a site full of bullshit. That site doesn't even give you any details about how to use it, what phone number to call, why they do it, etc...

I heard skype was looking into making long distance calls cheaper. The idea was you first connect with your pc over the internet to one of there pc's, on the other end of the world and after that the pc use the normal phone line to dial the person you want.

You still had to pay a bit, but since it doesn't cost anything to connect to a diffrent pc over the internet it would cost a lot less then the regular phone cost.

But this website has BS all over it.

I bought Planetside over the internet and they e-mailed me the Key. It could work similarly. Except they originally screwed up mine and signed me up for Ever quest or some equal gay ness...
