I don't believe much of it. I can believe the NY Times taking "Googlezon" to court, and it going to the Supreme Court. Other than that, I can't really imagine anything else being true.

Some ideas aren't really that bad. I only see a few problems.

The idea that eventually a free online news papers will be more read than a real news paper isn't really that strange. It is already happening. I also see a lot of news papers joining with eachother because they can't afford making there own news paper. The papers that are most read are also the free papers that you can get when you use public transport.

What I do doubt is that the quality of the news will get lower than the quality there is now. They will still need a source for there news, and that source will still have to be a real journalist.

That is a perfect example of the hive mind mentality.

Microsoft is too powerful. Google can be ignored, Microsoft cannot be.
