TBH I expected him to go down to a croc of some kind.

Great guy though, I feel for his wife and kids.

As sad as I am at his passing, it would have been much more fitting if he was killed by a 20ft croc or something.

Luck finally caught up to him. He was known for getting dangerously close to deadly animals and somehow escaping without any fatal injuries. It's just kind of ironic that a usually non-lethal creature was the one that put the nail in Steve Irwin's coffin. Weird twist of fate for the barb to pierce his heart.

Steve Irwin was a great guy. It is sad to hear that he passed away. Left behind was his two children, dog and wife. He will be missed by many.

Quote:If you haven't heard already, Steve Irwin (the Crocodile Hunter that you see all the time on TV) died today on the 4th of September, on the Batt Reef, pierced by a stingray barb through his heart near Cairns. Yeah I was shocked when I heard this too, he really entertained me when I first saw his 10 deadliest snakes in the world tv show where the most dangerous licked his face.

As he was raised around crocs and venomous snakes he knew how to handel them and the respect that should be given to these dangerous animals - so I never thought they would get the better of him, it was only his under estimation of this stingray that killed him

He will be missed by me for sure

Its a conspiracy, the Manta Ray wasnt acting alone....there was a turtle on the grassy knoll.

Wait, didn't the dog die of cancer? To be honest Stevo kind ruined alot of my life over the years. I know, i know, sounds crazy, but my mom is and was OBSESSED we have tape after tape of every single croc hunter and croc hunter diaries on tape. Also backup tapes in case something happens.

Christmas day, "Hey mom come in here", She replies "Hold on croc diaries is almost off"

And you can only see what is more important to her.

I heard he yanked the barb out of his chest before he passed out. That would make him a major BAMF.

Wouldnt that make his survival rate drop dramatically? I always heard if something large penetrates the skin more than 3 inches that leaving it in will stop the bleeding until you can get surgery.

I know it was poisonous, but damn.

I was thinking the same thing. Think of it as taking a jug of water and shoving a pencil through it. The jug won't lose as much water with the pencil still in it, as it fills the hole it made in the jug. When you pull the pencil out, there's nothing to close the gap that the pencil has made.

I can imagine wanting to pull out a poisonous barb, but most sting ray attacks are not lethal. I'm thinking that he accidentally sealed his fate when he removed the barb.

I think pulling it was more reactionary, than a planned event.

Yeah, I'm not doubting that, but he always had been calm when attacked/bitten/stung. Though, taking a sharp object to the chest certainly isn't the same as being bitten on the arm.

not to mention that the barb would have been pumping poison directly in to his heart, I think he was screwed either way

So far they havent said for sure if it was in his heart, we will know in a few days for sure or not.

I personally dont think it was, but who knows.

What are the chances though, isn't he like the 3rd person to ever be killed by a stingray?

Second known death in Australia. I believe it's a number like 17 worldwide.

I guess that's why they're called stingrays....

I'll miss him. Ironically I was wondering when the next show was going to be on the discovery channel. But it's on Animal planet now. And the next day I came to realise this.
