When people make fragmented post topics, even though there is plenty of room to type a full, meaningful one?

blue....that was just to rub it in LOL. and sometimes people just cant think of alot to say but can only express their opinion in a few words rather than many. I think the longest post ive ever made was like 5 - 7 lines. LOL

It depends what the topic is about. If it is about a really well known subject, and they post it in a way that it is really short, they just might get a few answers. But if it is a highly unknown subject, you might get no one to reply, or people might flame you a bit. In which case you better hit that post reply button and fix it. But as long as people understand what you are talking about I do not think it matters how long or fragmented your post is, because if they don't understand, they can always ask.

Fragmented post topics = more people reading to see where it goes.

Curiosity always wins out.

(Hence why I guess the "Don't click here" links are forbidden)

Heh I remember on the old Westwood forums I made a post that said basically, "Do not reply to this thread. If you do I will give you negative feedback. Again, do not reply for ANY reason as you will receive negative feedback."

As you can guess people replied and then actually got mad that I voted them down

There were some that didn't care about their rating, but I found it amusing that most people couldn't resist replying, and then expressed dismay at getting negative ratings for it.

LOL! It does not matter as long as the post can be understood.
