oh.

[considering your post length that should have been the end of my post]

Do you want to learn C++ .NET, C# or C++? I'd go for C++. And if you want C++ .NET then I think C# is a better alternative.

I suggest you just start by downloading scripts.dll source or something and getting your build environment set up right (if you have not done that already). Then try to change some things in scripts.dll, find out what stuff does what, google will answer the questions you will have. (Try not to ask for help from others too many, that tends to get annoying; only ask for help if you really really really can't figure it out) That's how I started anyway.

I never found any tutorial that is able to teach you more than the most simple things, way too little to really learn to do anything useful. Just dive into some (relatively) big project and try to change it. You will fail doing what you want in the beginning probably, but from my experiance it is the fastest way to learn.

Dave, if you run that Dcom Productions I'd like you to please send me a pm if you ever get the GUI Design page up

That stuff interests me.

try http://www.tutorialized.com

It used to be a great site, and still is, information-wise. However the guy who used to own it sold it, and the new owners but freaking ads all over it. They still have all the info though which is good.
