Please tell me it wasn't your money spent on that...

There will be a new better version out in just a few months making that worthless but pretty.

Yes that is true however the current iphone is behind already in several technologies so the next version of this will help it to catch up unless they are sensible and add more to the next iphone to stay ahead of the competition. Either way it's easily the sexiest phone on the market and if you just want a good looking phone you can't really do much better. I can also argue that you really don't need any of the shit on phones as the cameras for example are ALWAYS shit. I wouldn't pay that much for something pretty on principle but perhaps he has more money to spend.

That used to be true, but not anymore. My phone has a 2MP camera with flash, burst mode, 6x zoom, scene settings (day/night/beach/portrait/sunlight/etc).

There are several other phones on the market that have 5MP+ cameras, like the top of the line Nokia (which even has optical zoom), and the new Sony Cybershot phones which have all of the features of their Cybershot digital cameras.

If you notice, lots of news photos show people holding their phones up to take pictures. I think phones are moving towards becoming more than just a phone but rather high-end media devices.

Now if they could just figure out how to make them not drop calls

I see your point there but I guess I am a lot fussier since I have some pretty high end photography gear. The MP are all fine but aren't all that important. A large amount of MPs just means that the image will be larger and can be blown up to a larger extent (most people think the amount of MP dictates the quality of the image). The lenses are far more important here so I'm pretty sure you would find that an old digital compact with 2MP would be a lot better than a 5MP camera phone. You can also argue that some camera phones with a very small MP count are better than the ones with a billion trillion gazillion pixels. I just like to use tools that are dedicated to the task they were designed to do. That's it for my early morning rant

Well, I dare to say that my HTC TyTn II is either very close to my normal digicam, or even that it beats it.

Only thing it lacks is flash, but somehow it is still able to make nice pictures in dark areas.

Why is it that whenever I create a topic, it turns into a big flame fest?

Yes, I payed for this with my own money, however I get so much per month, I can afford it.

Apple may upgrade the phone, but it'll be a while before it happens.

The Nokia N95 and other series have Carl Zeiss optics and optical zoom. Far from a crappy cricket phone ccd vga camera.
