We will ignore the fact that no where in that picture does it give his PC name for now. Lets start with the hacking part. Please teach all of us how knowing someones PC name will allow you to hack them?

You should of blurred out your Windows Key.

Now anyone can come in and steal it and use it. And if by some chance you need to reformat your PC and reinstall windows, you're screwed and need to buy a new one because that key got black listed or was used the maximum amount of times it was allowed.

Thats not actually his key unless the 4-4-4-4-4 key standard has changed since I last reinstalled XP.

Im 100% sure this isn't my key.

Then Microsoft would have such a bad reputation and XP would have died a few years ago, But that's not the case.

The CD key is always, _always_ on the CD case, Nothing else.

That is not the installation key, it's a key thats generated, and its linked to the nick/company you registered on. I doubt it's any usefull.

As for the new PC hope you have alot of fun with it
What I am wondering is, did you get it or did you buy it yourself? Because it's pretty hard getting an AMD 64 3200 now a days. Lets say if it was 3 years ago it would have been high end, but now it's more comparable to a budget PC. Not that it performs bad or anything. I sill play Renegade on a p4 2.6ghz with 512mb ram, and Ti4200. 45 fps in a 42 player server average, so I can't complain for a sys that's from 2004. But if you want to play some of the newer games the CPU is going to have a though time, just because it cant keep pace with the Graphics cards which are just faster, especialy if you take on in the 8800 range it would be a waste.

I got this rig back in late '05.

I know the processor is old, but damn is it good, I previously had 512MB of ram and I have waited patiently for money to upgrade, I might buy a new hard drive, Though finding a SATA hard drive with more then 300Gb is pretty hard.

But a new graphics card is what I really need now, Because I mainly stick to Source games.

SATA Drives that size (and much larger) are really common.

I've been looking for a SATA hard drive, with 300Gb capacity, But most online stores I know only do SATA-II.

Newegg don't deliver internationally so that pretty much sucks, too.

SATA II is backwards compatible with SATA, I incase that's stopping you, it won't run alot slower either because the harddisk does not use such troughput yet.
