Quote:A 10-ton American spy satellite has lost power and could hit the Earth in the next few weeks, government officials said today.

The satellite, which no longer can be controlled, could contain hazardous materials, and it is unknown where on the planet it might come down

Quote:WASHINGTON (AP) - A large U.S. spy satellite has lost power and could hit the Earth in late February or early March, government officials said Saturday.

So did the American army run out of conventional bombs and resort to trying to bomb people with satellites now?

It's kayz, 70% of the world is covered in water, if it hits water, the fish would be killed, not us, so that should make you feel a bit better.

Or if it hits hollywood and ruins a movie set, and they cancel some great movie about to come out, then thats serious.

Well it did say "could contain hazardous materials". So who knows what that could be O.o

Rocket fuel, read the top link article.

It is harmful to anyone who makes contact with it, and i'd predict there'd be a lot.

It if hits the sea, it will be taken in by the currents, and then near the shoreline. Before you know it people will be down at the beach going in as humans and coming out with an extra head or something. If it hits the sea, it will effect more people than if it hits land.

Rocket fuel is liquid nitrogen, Under -10 degrees, it will freeze a part of the ocean and then naturally melt.

I think.

and if it falls in my back yard and i somehow manage to survive im going to sue

LOLOL, it would miss and bomb us allies instead.

Shouldn't really have nothing to worry about, it will burn up on re-entry, all you will see is a bright light as it falls though, if there is any part of it that makes it though, the sizes be so small and it will likey fall into the sea or some part of there world that would be safe.

But, if it does make it though, I hope it hits EA HQ.

- 1) We are being rained on by space junk on a daily basis. LITERALLY.
 - 2) Most of this satellite will burn up in the atmosphere.
 - 3) The "hazardous materials" that they are referring to are most likely 1) any rocket fuel that is left on board, 2) satellite-battery innards (most space satellites use special NiCds) and/or 3) perhaps some electronics bits that have all the usual suspects (lead, cadmium, ...) in them.
 - 4) This is what normally happens to dead satellites.

Judging by the news, I don't think it is going to burn up.

It is probably made to withstand the heat of re-entry. Government is worried it is going to land in China or Russia.

Yeah, probably...maybe not the whole satellite but sensitive parts of it may have been heavily shielded to withstand pressure and heat.

Even if a meteor crashes into the water, it could still start some massive title waves, hurricanes or even tsunamis.

Then again from the size of this asteroid, it sounds like most of it would burn up in the atmosphere anyway. There'd still be an impact, but I don't think it would be too threatening.
