I'm sure your parents had good intentions, so I wouldn't hate them for it.

The only thing you should and obviously are doing is to think for yourself, and decide for yourself what is proper for you.

You may see your parents as narrow-minded, but it's not their fault, as they were taught and treated much more harshly than you by their own parents, so this sort of thing is ingrained in them, and there is probably nothing you can do to make them understand.

Such is the way of things...perhaps someday you will be fussing at a child of your own, who will think that you are a n00b

I get really angry when I hear of people doing that to their kids, it's wrong in so many ways and to be honest, their views are so backward like muslims reading books backwards, something really wrong with it.

I enjoyed watching the movies and I only read one of the books, which was the last one (just had too, after so much hype) and I enjoyed every minute of it.

I disagree. You received that book on your own as a gift with no ties to your parents at all. You read it at night while they where asleep in the room that they gave to you.

- They didn't pay for the book or endorse it in anyway. It was a gift.
- They where asleep while you read it, so you weren't reading on their time.
- You read in your room that they gave to you, so you weren't invading in their space.

There is no connection between them providing for you and that book and how you used your time to read it. They did not have any real right to take it away. All of the reasons you said (living under their roof and eating from their money and sleeping in the bed they provided), have nothing to do with that book. If any of those where taken away, it still wouldn't effect your ability to possess and read the book.

I can understand that your parent's beliefs are what they are, but there is a limit.

They got on the anti-Harry Potter bandwagon without even reading the book. This bandwagon assumes that the book teaches how to do magic. These are the types of people who would hate anything and worse, take action to prevent others from doing what they themselves don't like to do.

I agree with everything else you said. It maybe the way of things.

Yeah, I simply can't stand this backwardness. It is the divisivness that really pisses me off. The "I am this and this so you can't be that and that" attitude makes me mad. This is why there are many extra unneeded wars today.

No...it says "F*ck you" at those who bash Harry Potter; aimed at people who bash it...not critique it. Your statement only proves how important it is to differentiate between bashing and critiquing...something nobody here is willing to do.

Well, Harry Potter is an incredibly easy read. It may be a lot of pages, but it is a children's novel.

I'm not much for reading in the first place, but I don't really like the whole "world of magic" concept.... the stories aren't bad, I just don't like the theme.

Awesome point you made, Iron. The current system that the world revolves under stifles the individual thought process from a very early age.

You go to kindergarten, 1st grade and then that's it...you are inside the system. If they teach you, then you know it. If they don't, then you don't know it. On top of this at the same time, the parents add in their share of shit at an early age (for example: religion).

By the time the person is entering the teen years, their brains have been fully programmed to think in one direction by the educational system they grew up in, society (and it's trends/norms), AND their parents. There are exceptions of course but these people are unfortunately a minority.

The result is you have a majority of people who are products of the current system...they are like drones. We got a lot of them in the world today simply playing their part in the chain.

They watch news from one channel and then feel like they are experts in world current events. They don't like history books because apparently it is "boring," and they see in black and white. If they close their eyes, then the whole world is dark for them.

And no, I am not generalizing because sadly the majority of the world's population is like that.

@ Feetseek: Thanks for sharing that book. I am ordering it.

I don't particularly care for Harry Potter; it's way below my reading level and I'm far more into Sci-Fi settings anyway.

There's a line, however, between not reading a book for a good reason (i.e. it doesn't interest you) and not reading it for a stupid, ignorant reason (i.e. the book is evil and people who read it also eat babies). Then there's another line beyond that, where personal preference becomes policy- and that line should never, ever be crossed.

I've run across crap like this before- more or less exactly like this; one of my teachers back in middle school forbade students from using Harry potter for book reports because of its references to 'witchcraft' and magic. It wasn't such a big deal for me, since I wasn't into the book, but the whole concept of being allowed to ban a book because you don't agree with its contents is dangerous and stupid. Furthermore, Harry Potter hardly presents a realistic view of anything- witchcraft, real life Wicca, has absolutely nothing whatsoever to do with brewing potions or flying on brooms. Nevertheless, you'll find that the same folks who'll say you can't read Harry Potter will also restrict access to books about alternate religions, which drives straight past banning a novel and straight into thought control.

You were absolutely right to be pissed off at your parents and teachers; what they did was wrong. You have a right to read whatever you desire, no matter how much others may disagree with it. Reading a book- any book, from the Bible to the Anarchist's Cookbook- does not violate the rights of any other human being.

When you say things like "Religious people..." and "everyone else..." it sure sounds like you're speaking for everyone in that group. He never said anything like "most" or "some" or "the extremists", not even "the loudest group within". So I'd say that counts as saying all.

Excellent point. The problem these days is that parent's personal policy becomes policy and are impressed upon their children from their youngest years. The result is we have more of the same type of people.

I think the point that many people miss is the fact that parents are only trying to look out for their children. Misguided? Sure. Closed-minded? Most likely. Wrong to do so? Not if they're truly being sincere.

It's the parents' job to help define their children's morals and beliefs. Of course, parents can go way wrong and indoctrinate their kids, but for the most part, the parents are only wanting to bring up their kids in a moral philosophy that they believe to be true. Personally, I wouldn't want to teach my kid any sense of moral relativism. I'm going to teach them a right and a wrong. I'd be a failure as a parent to tell my children to define their own morals and let society coach them. Once they get to a certain point, sure, I'm going to have to let them define their own morals, but until that point, I'm going to raise them as I see fit. It's something more parents need to be doing in America. Just not so much with the indoctrination.

The practice of telling your kid they can't do something isn't the problem; it's that doing so for no reason at all- or, worse, a reason grounded in ignorance- does far more harm than good. The problem is that people who never learned to think for themselves tend to pass their blind obedience along by force of will (or, in some cases, brute force). That people do this has nothing at all to do with Christianity or any other religion- it has to do with people raising children in such a way that will cause them to actually resent their upbringing and- in the worst case- all semblance of stable, normal behavior.

It is perfectly acceptable, even beneficial to pass one's own beliefs on to one's children. It gives those children a much-needed sense of stability and comfort until they can develop their own beliefs based on- here's the key- experience and knowledge. Experience and knowledge will be acquired one way or another, sooner or later, and the longer they are restricted the greater the shock to the system when they suddenly one day aren't. You can't keep a human being's head locked in a vise until they turn 18; I know not a single person whose parents did that who doesn't have serious emotional and psychological issues today. Not surprisingly, most of those same people have also strongly rejected their parents' beliefs and several of them are still trying to figure out where they really belong. In order to raise a happy, healthy, well adjusted person, you have to stop force-feeding them your own ideology at some point and let them come to their own conclusions- even if that means letting them dabble here and there with things you strongly dislike (so long as those things aren't illegal).

That doesn't mean you shouldn't be allowed to take your child to church or send them to Sunday school, but it does mean that you can't place restrictions on what they may or may not do for the sole purpose of preventing exposure to those things until you can no longer possibly do so and get away with it. All children become curious, and if you don't let them satisfy that curiosity then they will rebel. It's all a question of degree, and banning entirely fictional stories written purely for entertainment goes way too far.

Maybe I'm not the world's leading expert on good parenting, not being a parent myself, but I'll be damned if I can't speak from my own upbringing and my experience in learning how my friends and family were raised. I cannot think of a single example of a person, given an open-minded, understanding childhood (with reasonable discipline and a solid moral foundation of one sort or another), who wasn't far better off than someone forced along their parents' version of the straight and narrow until the day they left for college. I hope I remember that lesson if and when I ever do decide to start a family.

Quite interesting how a number of Atheists convert to a religion well after they become adults... some who are revered in many intellectual circles.

One example of someone was a "devout atheist"-turned-chrsitan who is well received in both the literary world and the philosophy world is C.S. Lewis.

Quite interesting how a number of Atheists convert to a religion well after they become adults... some who are revered in many intellectual circles.

Bertrand Russell from the "intellectual circles" said this:

Quote:There is something feeble and contemptible about a person who cannot face life without the help of comfortable myths and cherished illusions.

Because our beliefs are NOT based in myths and illusions but in logic and objectivity?

Please don't make sensationalist false claims when you clearly have not made an effort to understand the philosophy behind Atheism. I thoroughly resent this false statement you made as it is the highest form of intellectual injustice that is targeted at Atheists and Agnostics today.

Yeah, because if we think we are the highest life forms, then we are automatically arrogant right?

FYI, the knowledge that we are the highest life form leads to humbleness and the highest level of responsibility as human beings rather than a feeling of arrogance as you falsely claim. Claims such as yours are the usual garbage thrown at Atheists by religious folks; the same self-righteous folks who claim the world is full of sinners in need of salvation (like as if there are no other problems to solve).

Also, I feel more responsible as an Agnostic than I ever was as a Christian. And I was a devout Christian at that. But I was indifferent; I saw the world as sinners and believers just as you do today. You can't go about solving the world's problems with that attitude. As an Agnostic, I see EVERYONE as a human being and have a greater respect for human life, the world we live in, the environment that we must protect for future generations and the animal species that must be preserved. There is no place for "the earth is going to end" bull.

I feel disgusted when Bible thumpers get all excited and hyped up when Israel goes to war because apparently these are the "end-times."

I never have not used logic.

Correct me if I am wrong but the Bible is supposed to be the inspired word of God. As I understood, God came down to men in many forms (dreams, revelations, voice, visions) and that made men write down the books that you call the Bible. I know you never heard that because no Christian wants to go into what "inspired by God" really means. The men wrote down in their ignorance what they felt to be true at the time. NOBODY wants to talk more about the whole "God-inspired" issue.

Now unless the man (and men) were a bunch of total retards, why would they make repeated mistakes over and over again in several books spanning years apart of the Bible simply reflecting the limited knowledge of the then-prevailing understanding of the world?

Originally Blue wrote on Thu, 28 February 2008 16:46and please give me your sources on that. I've seen nowhere in the bible, or on the internet where God said that the world is flat.

That's the problem. If God had said it, then the Bible would be correct no? But as explained above, men in their lack of knowledge and ignorance wrote the Bible.

Quote:And after these things I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind should not blow on the earth, nor on the sea, nor on any tree. Rev 7:1

Quote:As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us. Ps 103:12

And don't tell me these verses are not to be taken literally because I have other verses that would blow you away.

There are many many more verses that the Catholic Church in Europe upheld as the truth. And the only reason Christians don't believe this garbage from their own Bible today is because clearly the times have changed and scientific discoveries that you have learned in middle school are the accepted and dominant answers to ancient ignorance.

Your being hypocritical. You just said that I never said anything like "most" or "some."

Then you go on to say that means I meant to say "all."

I didn't say all, and I didn't say most, I didn't specify any amount. I think that the group of people, not everyone, not some, but the group in general. I have no idea how many people think like that, therefore I left the actual count out.

I will never say all or none in such a way, especially when it relates to people's own morals.

If you still don't understand what I mean than here is an example.

We got 2 religious people. Both of the same religion however one is more strongly religious.

What I meant by that comment was the one who is so strongly religious that they are blinded to everything else, not the other guy.

Wow, you are a blowhard.

Since when do people feel humble when they view themselves as superiors? The VAST MAJORITY of people with power are arrogant fucktards. Very few people are humbled by the power of which they hold.

The fact that you claim what I said is sensationalist is proof enough of your utter arrogance on the subject.

I realize that I omitted the question mark, but I thought it was clear that it was just a simple question on the flip side of what you were arguing. Thanks for blowing it out of proportion as if that's meant to be some attack. Who's being the sensationalist, now?

Just because you've come to regret your upbringing doesn't mean you're any more stable mentally than you were as a devout Christian. Ever think that you possibly hold the same arrogance as you did then? It sure looks like it to me. Then, perhaps, it's not the religion that made you arrogant. Maybe it's just you.

Oh, and don't ever think you can label me as a Bible thumper. Again, that just shows your blatant arrogance on the issue. Everybody who disagrees with you MUST be a Bible thumper because why else would people disagree. Right? Wrong. I'm a Theist, thank you very much. I don't believe in the Bible anymore, but that doesn't mean I'm going to start bashing Christians for believing what they do. You, for whatever fucked up reason (ie. arrogance), feel that it's your job to keep up your rebellion. Good job, you're certainly making Atheism and Agnosticism more attractive world views.

Oh, and again, you only need to look no further than yourself to see that your claim of humbleness is defeated.

Since when in time did Atheists view themselves as superior to anything? You need to do a lot of reading to understand the philosophy behind Atheism. Don't talk like you are an expert when you don't have the slightest clue. And also, Atheists hold no power whatsoever in their mere beliefs.

That said, the rest of your post is garbage.

And yes, calling me "arrogant" and referring to my upbringing and classifying this debate as my continued "rebellion" shows your total lack of judgment. It is certainly a good way to blow off your steam. You guys do an excellent job of defending your beliefs: by name-calling and "e-screaming."

An Atheist's humblenss is in context with other living beings. To say that I am not humble because I question and debate and argue is the most arrogant statement I ever heard. We have too many people in this world who shut up and sit tight afraid to voice their opinions.

The fact that you think man is humbled by the idea that they are alone in the world as far as "supreme beings" go is funny. Religious people, as a whole, are just as humbled. There are plenty of VERY intelligent people that are Christians.

There are the annoying extremists and fundamentalists who make it a point to judge others, but that's not religion as a whole. Again, just because you're rebelling against the fundamentalism that you were brought up into doesn't mean you're any more humbled than religious people as a whole. More humbled than your parents? Possibly, but don't make me laugh by claiming that people are humbled by admitting to the idea that there's no god.

Stop calling me a Christian. It doesn't help your argument to lump me in with fundamentalists. It just shows that you're just throwing out random shit at me after getting pissy with my first paragraph or two.

Edit: Oh, you removed the part where you implied I was a Christian still. Good catch... though I made it obvious.

Warranto completely ignores current religious trends and brings up a few exceptional examples from ages past.

Quote:A staunch atheist at the time, Strobel decided to use his journalism and legal training to investigate whether there was any credibility to Christianity.

What kind of an idiot Atheist (a staunch one at that) needs to investigate further to find any "credibility" to an opposing school of thought? Haha...this guy had no initiative. He does not deserve to be called an Atheist. No wonder he converted to Christianity like the mis-informed jelly-doughnut that he was.

i major in nigonomotry

also he was most likely was ignorant enough already that he first became an athiest as a rebellious teen and then while still with the same retarded mind found some charismatic priest who got him to believe in christianity without really proving or saying anything.

Thinking that you might have actually said somting intellectual, I went and google'd...
"nigonomotry".

You believe everything needs to be proved? You're obviously wrong.

lol at how you are totally not understanding the joke he made there.

'nigonomotry'

It relates to a commonly used term of endearment among people of African descent, which I don't think I'll say due to everyone probably going OMFG RACIST.

I'm not a racist. You're an idiot. You're also a victim. Poor you, stop feeling sorry for yourself.

Rocko, once again you complain about the race distinctions which you also uphold, one side or the other, please...

With all due respect, you are once again more interested in my choice of words and presentation instead of replying to the subject. So much for debate, huh?

Peace.
I do reply to the subject, and you fail to even consider it.

You tell me that I'm going off-topic, but look at you now. You're avoiding some of my replies to this topic. This is probably, wait, this IS the third time I said this.
Quote: Also, you offered verses that'd "blow me away." I still see no verses, just more insults.
and all you've said to me is "you're being a coward, you're going off topic, etc."

My definition of debate, and a common one, is "A formal disagreement between two parties," and my definition of argument, again a common one, "A violent disagreement, which usually involves verbal insults." You fail to see the difference, or even understand the meaning, but you tell me that I wouldn't even survive a debate.

WOW you are a big dumbass that can't read. Clearly the additional verse offer was under a certain context you are dumb enough to not understand. Keep posting and make yourself look like an idiot more.

As for the name-calling, welcome to the internet and don't act as if you never name-called anyone here.

EDIT:

Imfaooo @ your definition of argument.
