Hi, I own a fan site. CNC relived. It's a site to pay tribute the icon of RTS, Command & Conquer.
Visit Us at <http://www.ivisyung.com>

or go to my forum @ www.ivisyung/phpBB3

HTML, Times New Roman, and Paint.

Impressive.

I like the way half the links link to non-existent content, more sites should do this!

I'm not expecting people to be great at X/HTML or CSS, but people should attempt to make the color schemes not clash. Oh, and it wouldn't kill people to actually make sure their links work.

Well, technically, i used photoshop and flash for the menu. Also, i scripted some html by hand.

I also used Frontpage for the css and dreamweaver for the contents.

(ps) links to no content because it's still under development. so far, some are up and running.

You should maybe finish your site before you release it.

If the pages don't exist, don't link to them on a public website until they do exist. How hard can it be?

I was new to HTML at one point, too, but that didn't mean I should make sites with colors that absolutely CLASH. Plus, linking to pages that don't exist? Come on, that's a fucking no-brainer. It'd be one thing if he was like, "hey, I'm making this site, tell me what you think of it." Instead, he mentions it's a new fan site, and usually when you make those announcements, it's that the site is finished. I certainly have no desire to release my newest portfolio design and expect people to try to use it. It's nowhere near working condition, and I use logic to know that I shouldn't release it.

I would say <http://renegadecommunity.com/> instead as that at least has static content opposed to a forum with only discussion.

It's not too bad for the beginnings of a site. IMO it needs more work (dead links, etc) before I would have announced it.

I wonder what editor he used, like 95% of the first page is all CSS.
