What OS is she running?

On her computer in the share settings, you'll need to specify a local user that has access to the shared files. Then on your computer, you can map a drive. Check the box that asks you if you want to connect as a different user and type HERPCNAME\Username and the password when it prompts you.

Go whitelist your subnet in your mom's firewall.

well me me say this i have a network set up called Home Central (yes its an access point) threw my belkin router as seen in these screen shots and it is passworded protected WEP also note both pcs are set to the same workgroup called also Home Central. A while back i disabled lot of service's on both pcs but i re enabled any that related to file printer or internet sharing or internet so im sure thats not the problem ahhh my pc is connected straight to the the router my moms (which is downstairs is connected via wireless network card ok sp pretty much as said i have a network,both pc shave all network and etc services running,both have same work group,network is password protected,also we both admins on our pc's ok so heres when i get confused...im not sure how to share folder so i just right click and hit properties then sharing tab then hit advance sharing and i get something like this then hit permissions select everyone and hit full control so after looks like this LOL, you blacked out the wireless channel. Fucking bravo.

Anyway, like I was saying, go whitelist your subnet on your mom's computer. Open up her firewall program and look for a way to allow network IPs to access it. It doesn't even need to be the whole subnet; you can just allow your computer's IP access.
