with the way the game places you randomly i make that mistake all too often, and sometimes it costs me. i was playing on the map that i can't remember it's name(lol.. it's the one with the tiberium field in a cave, both harvesters graze there, and there's always a big fight for control of it), and playing gdi. a friend was on the same side and we were both going out as gunners to see what harm we could do to the enemy base. i saw a stealth up against a large rock and didn't think anything of it. oh good i thought, we have stealth support in case enemy inf get too close. well he opened up on us and man, was i shocked back into reality or what!? anyway, he did some damage to both of us, though we finally got him. but it was a long trip back to the base to repair. lol...

This happens to me all the time, especially if I've been cast on one side or the other more that night. I'll start a new game, walk out, and be totally startled by that mammy, thinkgng "How the Hell did that get into our base with no one noticing!!!...oh wait, I'm GDI...."

Warning; anyone who read the above posts, these guys were just kidding you, Ha haha, No one would admit to such odd behaviour in public. But I must admit they sounded pretty convincing,

When i'm GDI i quite often hear EVA announce "Ion Cannon Beacon Deployed" This is followed by me, rushing back to the GDI base to difuse it.
