Well that is because you dont try to improve them at all. All are 'quick builds'

Try using a magic want to get details in your models....

Seriously put more effort in it.

If this makes you stay away from our release forum, then I find it a great initiative!

I totally agree with Reaver. Mate, if you look at my skins, you'll at least see that I've spent a few hours adding or editing details. I'm not gonna start the whole "I SKINZ BETAR D3N U D0 LULZ!!" crap, but there's a lot more you can do.

EDIT: Not really a few hours, even, that's what it takes to learn how to do things properly. After that, it usually takes only half an hour or so.

So let me get this straight...

You post lots of skins in the release forum.
You get a lot of feedback telling you spend more time to release detailed work.
Feedback is taken negatively and a flame fest ensues.
You get sick of people saying "bad" things about your skins.
So you create your own site so the people who enjoy your work can still find it, and the people who don't like it don't have to put up with the massive amount of threads you create.
But now you're just going to bump this thread every time you release new work?

Sorry but that logic kinda fails.
First of which, people are telling you to release quality work you spend time on, rather than everything you create. They're not telling you to give up.
Secondly, now you're simply advertising your site, which isn't really what either the mod forum or mod release forum is for, from my point of view at least.
