Retardedly silvery and the fact the laser is constantly pointing and it lost its unfolding animation makes it appear to have a bad case of downs syndrome.

Not releasing it also tremendously affects the quality in a negative fashion

I don't "love" Russia, but In my opinion, Russian weaponry is pretty cool. Especially stationary

SAMS and mobile SAM vehicles, like the 9K37 Buk.

<http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/SA-11>

Have read a lot of pages and sites about Russian weaponry, and enjoyed it.

I'm a history fan I guess. I'm also interested in German weaponry during World War 2 (especially tanks and AA).

Am I the only one here who thinks that it looks retarded?

Problems I see:

1. Why is there a red light pulsating through the entire model every two seconds? It would make sense if the circuit board had that effect... but not the entire model.

2. What's the point of the laser on the dish? The point of a dish is to send and receive signals, not pinpoint and designate a target or position.

If you were going for the idea that the laser would guide the missile to the beacon then you are mistaken. The way that works is that the missile would hit the TARGET of the laser, not the source of it. If you wanted to make it hit the source, then it should have been a flashing strobe light.

But even more over, the missile doesn't need any physical guides to reach the beacon, or else it wouldn't need the signal dish on the beacon. The latitude and longitude are most likely transmitted digitally for the missile to read and locate on its own.

3. Why is it constantly open? It should only open when you deploy it... that's why it has the ability to do so.

4. This can obviously be used as a cheat.

the reason it's open, is that the nuke has only a deployed model and a back model, when the ion has deployed closed and back. (also reborn nuke has a closed one too)
