It's little more than viral advertising for Wisconsin, but these look delicious, especially to a burger lover like myself.

As a native Bulgarian, I can completely agree with the point of your picture, but it's stupid and ignorant to think they don't have burgers in Europe.

The main difference being in American burgers and European burgers is that they use a lot less corn in Europe (Since it isn't heavily subsidized like it is here in the United States), which leads to a less-fattening meal.

Lol, I would defy anyone to fit one of those in their mouth? They are huge!

Also, whoever got Joe from Family Guy to do the voiceover was a genius.

Though this image may be true... I could also post the exact same image but with a fat European woman and a thin American woman and it would also be true.

Communication bypassing ftw.

I was kidding for the second one. And Dover "People in the US actually believe this.", Does this mean you don't consider yourself an American?

Should I have quantified? Some people. Most people. Absolutes are (almost) never correct. I thought we were beyond this.

And for the record, you're wrong on the first one too. How many European women have you seen? Have you ever been outside of your state?

I'm just glad that we Americans generally have the sense to consider being morbidly obese to be fucking disgusting and a completely undesirable lifestyle. Generally.

There are some great women and some not so great women all around the world. These pictures never really made sense to me.

Statistically speaking, Americans are fatter than any other nation.

To be more precise, they not only have the most obese people (relatively speaking) they also have the highest average weight.
So not only Americans in general are heavier, there are also more people overweight.

Most likely. I frequent fast-food establishments and take in a lot of High Fructose Corn Syrup, which is something I wouldn't be doing if I lived in, say, Europe.

I was only joking by saying that. But seriously, I eat a crap load of fast food, pizza, and junk food and I'm still unnaturally skinny.
