What would you do if you were President of the United States and had to make this choice?

Scientists have discovered a meteor that is headed towards the earth. They have calculated that it will strike France in 2 days, at approximately 2:30 A.M. The meteor is large enough to completely wipe France from the face of the earth forever.

France and the United Nations have requested that the United States send all available ships and aircraft to help evacuate the country. Among the ships and planes you could be sending are many that are being used to fight the war on terror overseas.

As the President, you must decide: Do you...

A) Stay up late on the night of the impact to watch the coverage live?

B) Tape it and watch it in the morning?

mascots throughout the country are being changed because they have an american indian theme.
school team names being changed because they are named after some group in history which was renowned for being fierce(vikings, titans etc) boyscout troops named after famous men being renamed because that famous man fought for the south in the civil war.
a navy jet outside a school in california not being welcome because it is improper there are many stories like this going on throughout usa and uk which are really making me sick!

too many people being offended for every little thing.
when i was a kid, there were "custer's last stand" jokes. people died there too, didn't make the joke less funny.

people in this country need to stop feeding the politically correct trolls and lighten up before we end up with a country of mindless morons too afraid to say or write anything because someone's feelings may get hurt.

It's true. The world is becoming more and more "politically correct", but by doing this, the world also contradicts their own laws. The Freedom of Speech and expression take a wierd little twist when something is said that people don't like. I find it kind of funny how people are able to sue for slander, when it could simply be someone else's opinion, which is within the law.

Then we have those people who flinch when the word "nigger" is said. It's even more so strange how it's the white people that seem to take more offense to it whenever the word is spoken. At least, thats what I've noticed from my own personal experiance. Of course, this is just an example, but people are gradually getting more and more tard-warriorish and soon we'll end exactly as you say: "Afraid to say or write anything".

It says "The meteor is large enough to completely wipe France from the face of the earth forever." The meteor was just big enough to destroy an area the size of France.

The largest a meteor can be is 330 feet, anything larger then this is considered an Asteroid. So even the largest meteor couldn't wipe out the world. Something this size would create around the area of 100 megatons, and beable to wipe out an area the size of a large city/small state (Most of France would be gone...).

France didn't just 'back out of the war'. They didn't do what they did out of some sense of morality. Its was greed. France wanted power and money, and didn't care if millions of Iraqis suffered for it. That's why I don't like France.

France consistently supported Saddam. They didn't just oppose a war, they supported Saddam. They rejected any compromise that ended with 'Saddam will be removed'. Even the compromise that would have given them the month or so they wanted was rejected because it said Saddam would be removed if he didn't comply by that deadline.

So we have a damn good reason for not liking France. We did listen to what they had to say. What they had to say was, "No matter what happens, leave a brutal dictator in power because France is making money off him."

Wake up and smell reality.

waiting a month would not have made france happy.

france said they would veto any new resolution regardless of what it said.

waiting a month would have put our troops at even greater risk due to the weather and due to iraq having more time to prepare.

as for the anti french jokes coming out at this time... sure there is an 'agenda' behind it. that doesn't mean that the person telling it or the people laughing at it would ever think it were funny if such an event actually took place.

that is the real gauge to judge such things by... intent.

They didn't join because they don't just want money, they want power and influence as well. Chirac wanted to lead the world against America's position to gain prominence. If they suddenly supported the war, France wouldn't have a chance at getting the influence Chirac wanted. Now that France's gamble has failed, Chirac is trying to force France back into Iraq, hoping to at least get some of the money back France lost when Saddam fell.

Duke of Nukesthe US should have benefited economically from being at war...

How could our economy benefit from being at war? It would cost us money to manufacture the weapons and ammo, fuel, and to send our forces over there. It would ruin our relationship with middle eastern countries. It would cause us to increase the gas prices (from losing the oil, plus stupid gas companies over here increasing the prices to take advantage of the war). It would also hurt the tourist industry. The only economically benefit that would come out of it is the business oportunities that came out of post-war-iraq, which would be there rather the US was involved, or not.

Duke of Nukesall I'm saying is that just because France gets more money for not going to war...that doesn't mean that's why they aren't. Why not join in when the US had already gone to war if that was the case?

Why get down and dirty and actually help get the reward, when you can just sit back, wait till everyone else is done and complain and cry to the UN to get the reward?

It doesn't seem at all suspicious that they didn't want anything to do with the war in Iraq, but now that it's finished, they're all over the benefits after the war in Iraq?

America's actions regarding this war seem to price that "benefit" without any care. Growing numbers of Iraqi civilians and our own countrymen die as time passes. Perhaps France is the smart one here, planning different approaches to the Iraq issue than rushing in with the pure force hailed by America's leaders. Our plan obviously left no control following the killing of whoever we deemed as "evil."

Finally, the France we speak of is only the government of the French. The split opinions in America at this time are clear to us, but do you really think everyone in France backs what their government does?

Finally, the France we speak of is only the government of the French. The split opinions in America at this time are clear to us, but do you really think everyone in France backs what their government does?

Allow me to retort.....

EpeyonWait wouldn't an astroid that big destory the Earth's ecosystem?

The large Earth bound rock in question is a meteor, not an asteroid, there is a difference (Explained in one of my previous replies to this thread.). It only takes a meteor no larger than a few hundred feet to take out an area the size of France. The impact would throw up dust/whatever in to the atmosphere, but it wouldn't be large enough to effect the entire Earth.

Yeah, you're right. France's brutatlity sounds to have an ableness to even measure up to some things seen in Iraq.

Duke of NukesJavacxNice to know you'd allow the deaths of millions of children.

Congratulations Java, you are the only person in this thread that I have any respect for. I find this whole thread, even the joke about it, amazingly disgusting. To attack someone/defend yourself in the line of duty, but to say we should let innocents die because the country didn't want to attack Iraq...that puts you somewhere between a snail and the white stuff that forms at the corners of your mouth when you get really thirsty.

Just like when the French didn't help us in the Terrorist Wars?
Like when the French didn't help us fight Great Britain? :rolleyes:

would appreciate the huge dust cloud lumbering over our country or the huge tidal wave caused by the impact. Spain and Germany would be affected a great deal too. In addition the joke is casualties.

How exactly would you be hit by a tidal wave if this meteor were to hit France? If the impact was great enough and close enough to the shore it would create shock waves that would cause tsunamis, but these wouldn't effect the area around France/Germany/Spain/Etc., the shock waves would be sent towards the UK, and towards North America.

Oh, and I can't believe that I missed this...

They didn't help us fight Great Britain? Now which one is it... Are you a German; or do you just don't know jack shit about WWI or WWII?

When pieces of land plunge into the ocean they cause waves, if the piece of land was large enough, combined with the shock wave, it would cause a huge wave. Any meteor big enough to "completely wipe France from the face of the earth forever" is large enough to environmentally destroy Western Europe. Also GB is the UK, i'm telling you this because your post made it seem Spain fell off the map of course. The dust cloud formed by France getting wiped from the earth would at least remain over Europe for a few years.

Oh... I didn't notice the "(GB)"...

And a tital wave isn't formed until the shockwave reaches sea floor high enough... The shockwave can travel accross the sea floor until it gets near North America, than when it reaches sea floor that is high enough, it creates a tital wave.

Good point on the tidal wave thing, using that knowledge the tidal wave may never even form properly before hitting Britain because of the small distance between the countries. The dust cloud is still un-arguable though. Your lucky in not one of those assholes that picks on spelling mistakes. Not that you care.

Actually ignore that. Once the shockwave and the winds hit the air pressure will follow, literally sucking the ocean out from underneath itself. Also there would be rushing air behind it, pushing it.
