Do it yourself. Open the logo in photoshop and erase as much of the border/background/whatever you want to make it transparent. Faster and eaiser.

Renhelp uses frames and no one has complained yet. There really useful thing as you don't have to update multiple documents to add something new. The main reason I use them is because I'm mixing HTML and PHP documents on the same page and using frames makes it a little easier. The navigation on renhelp is in a seperate fram to the content.

Who the hell cares that you'll never use frames?

Why exactly don't you like frames? Because they make loading faster? Because they make it so you only have to update only one html page instead of every page without frames? Because they look good? Because you don't know how to use them? etc?

php include is just as fast a siframes in most cases, you only have to update one page at a time with the include aswell, they look ok but the chunky scroll bar puts many people off, lol everybody knows how to use them.

Some people hate them some people love them and they both can be good, I mean even phpBB uses them in the admin section and they work well, I use php include simply becuase its easier , but it's just personal prefrence really.

Nvm that, you can just use photshop to easily save transparency:

I found this on google:

Frames don't need the scrollbars though or even borders. The ones on renhelp are seamlessly used. The include does work but It's not HTML, why use PHP to make a page that can be done with frames?
