Well any ways here it goes:

1: If you want make indentations in the cliff were you want your water fall to be.

2: Make a plane at the top or your water fall and turn it into an editable mesh

3: select the edge next to the edge were you want your water to fall

4: extrude the edge and move it down along the path were you want your water to fall

5: continue step 4 until you have a descent curve of water

6: (this is to make it look like the one on field) select all the side edges and camphor it or extrude and move it back, either will have slightly different results.

7: now find your water texture and apply it then in the texture menu go to pass 1 and select the menu tab "vertex material" and under stage 0 Mapping select from the drop down list Linear Offset and in the box type in VPerSec=0.1. This make the water move

8: export to W3D to see the results

If you have questions IM me in MSN or AIM.

People, people... Please don't assault each other, instead help each other...

I'm not going to get in the middle of a war, take that into the servers... Take care of those things over there, but please be more helpful!

Anyway, the tutorial is actually found at renhelp, at <http://www.renhelp.co.uk/Tutorials/FAQ> (I hope the link works, else you know where to find it.) Anyway, I think it was copy-pasted already.

I hope that General Havoc could link the FAQ with the water tutorial to avoid this in the future.
Thx!

There are no stupid questions, just stupid answers.

I really admire you for asking such a question, especially if you are a moderate or execptional mapper. That encourages others to ask similar questions instead of using up hours on finding some element that would suite the map. Instead of searching for a element, ask, continue on another map and then return to find out that you can find it here and simply click on the link. Saves a lot of time for the mapper and active community members probably find a tutorial a lot faster when they know where to look and therefore maybe rewarded with a map.

I hope you continue to ask and help others that do...
